DAIRY BARN IS PARAMOUNT

Only Contented Cows Will Turn Out Good Milk and in Quantity-Is Source of Real Income.

Many people like to talk about the "good old days." "It sure was great when"-and so it goes. You know what we have in mind: along in his old way, berating modern to the old "red barn" and all that goes with it. He wonders why his neighbor, who has built a new barn with all the latest labor-saving equipment, gets so much time to spend in the fields or out in the car, and keeps his

The farm of today is a big business that requires a big mind to run it successfully, just as the building business requires alert men to make a success of it. The two are inevitably linked, for the building program on the modern farm is one of its most important problems. Successful farmers and successful farm builders have one idea in common. They recognize the value of modern equipment and practice, The exponents of the "good old days" cannot understand it "no how."

In this building program the dairy parn is of paramount importance. Therein lies the source of real income, erence to wind and sun. Because the barn runs from the warm south to the cold northwest, construction should be arranged to meet conditions and the successful builder knows that dead air spaces will keep out cold air. But, as was suggested, the big problem is the floor. In the first place, to be sanitary, it should be as near waterproof as possible. Furthermore, it must be easy to clean, durable and easy for the cow.

For all-around service concrete has been found very efficient for all except the stall. The cow cannot stand on concrete very long without getting tired, nor can she very well lie on it without risk to health. For that reason cork brick and creosoted block are used as flooring in the stall. They are both warm, easy on the feet of the cattle, easy to keep clean and impervious to water. With the construction details fairly under way, the big consideration is equipment. The progressive builder and farmer consider only the most efficient labor-saving equipment. Why? Because they want to get the maxlmum production with the help available. And the fact that it is mighty scarce is no secret. The farmer who owns that "old red barn" is continually fretting about getting hired help. "They're all going to the city," is his plaint. But the same complaint is not heard on the modern farm-because the help find something has been done to make work a pleasure. They do trary to nature. Of his father it is ideas and longing for the "good old not break their backs shoveling litter written: "He considered not his own times." Well, he is out of luck, and into a wheelbarrow and carting it from body now dead, when he was about an some day may awaken to the fact. the dairy barn. Under his back to improvements and clings It is whisked away to the waiting manure spreader outside the barn. And likewise with the feed. It is carried by feed carriers which can be stopped in front of each stall.

Any equipment which causes a reduction in labor expense is an asset it! "Blessed be the God and Father to the farm. Overhead carrier equip- of our Lord Jesus Christ, which acment takes care of that. Liberal trackage increases the general comfort and gotten us." Born of God! What a convenience and insures the satisfaction of help which today is one of the most important problems of the farm-

The purpose of any cow stall is to provide a secure yet convenient means of tving the animal, which will at the same time afford the comfort and was in himself, but proclaims a fafreedom necessary in the production of large quantities of milk. The new dairy barn should be built as a workshop, not merely a stable.

It is here that the building contractor and farmer can get their heads together and plan a barn that will be proper place for the herd. Certain essential features should be incorporated in these plans to achieve what the farmer wants-production; and what the builder hopes to give-service. In the construction of the barn, cleanliness, cow comfort and health, convenience and economy are factors to be considered.

Naturally, the site is important. It should be located on a sunny, welldrained slope, where surface water will run away from the barn. Natural drainage is a pound of prevention. It should be placed with regard to the farm building. Next, the size is to be considered.

Owing to the development of standard measurements in stalls, gutters and alleys, this can be easily figured out. Those most frequently used are 36 feet in width. This provides plenty of room to place the cows in two rows, facing in or out. The two-row arrangement permits better lighting and ventilation.

Aside from the details involved in the building of walls and roof, of it might be well at this point to men- "Well," he answered, "most anything, tion the placing of the barn with ref- except no more twins."

The responsibility for this great task rests upon the builder as well as the farmer, for the builder makes many of the recommendations that the latter accepts. By promoting the best things and the latest labor-saving equipment, he is creating a wholesome atmosphere and making surroundings so attractive that he accomplishes a double-barreled purpose, he constructs and inspires.

5. In Canaan, Isaac is found by the well of springing water. And here, again, is a holy symbolism which the Lord has interpreted for us. "A fountain of living water, springing up unto everlasting life." "Out of his inner most being shall flow rivers of living water." There is no mistaking it; It is the ministry of the Holy Spirit to the regenerated man, making Christ a present reality, satisfying his craving heart so that, no longer craving, it be comes a channel of blessing to all around. This is Isaac's portion and it is yours and mine. But if these figures of such blessing are to become a reality we must dwell by the well.

6. But this well of Isaac's has a special name: "Lahairoi"-"the well of him that liveth and seeth me." Oh how that name speaks to us of the loving and endless care of our unfailing God!
